5.		Favor	Don C Moss	The scope of ADHD is much wider in the general community than the average person realizes. As such, every employee in every department must become basically familiar with potential difficulties when dealing with those affected.
			Jodi Chen	Thank you, Supervisor Horvath, for drawing attention to ADHD, a condition affecting millions. I would like to highlight the challenges of accessing the Class A stimulants essential for functioning in school, work, and daily life. Strict regulations requiring monthly renewals, in-person visits, and limited refills make the process frustrating and difficult to manage. As a parent and family advocate, I am all too familiar with navigating these frequent follow-ups. It is far too easy for individuals to fall through the crack when faced with prescription lapses, an overburdened healthcare system, and/or pharmacy shortages.  Untreated ADHD doesn't just affect focus; it increases the risk of co-occurring conditions like anxiety and depression, worsening overall mental health. Improving access and support for those who rely on these medications is crucial.
